

I'm writing because I feel that the FCC should NOT implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law protections. This law has greatly improved my time at home, because I used to receive at least one to two calls a night and now I'm only receiving maybe one to two calls a week, if that. I am releived to be free of the hassling and embarrassment of the calls that I used to receive. I'm not a very "wealthy" person and this law has saved me from the embarrassment of questions like..."how can you not afford to do this if you can afford to have this telephone we're taling on?" and from the hassling of them not accepting my answer as "NO!" I used to be afraid to answer my phone for fear that I'd not be able to get off the phone after telling them only once that I wasn't interested. I feel that if the FCC were to lessen this law it would make the public feel that decision makers don't really care about what they want. Thanks for your time.

Briann McDivitt